THE NATIONAL GALLERY IN LONDON HAS BANNED SELFIE STICKS

The gallery says it has placed them in the same category as tripods, which are banned "in order to protect paintings, individual privacy and the overall visitor experience". [...] The selfie stick is an elongated pole on which a camera or mobile phone can be attached to take a better photo. [...]

The ban by the National Gallery was welcomed by art critic Brian Sewell. He told The Times: "They are possibly quite dangerous to the art work and cause appalling crowding around a painting". [...] Some visitors at the National Gallery have backed the ban. Morny Davison told the Press Association the selfie stick was "an interference in what one hopes is a reasonably calm experience looking at great pictures." Another visitor said art lovers would be "thrilled" by the ban, adding: "They should have been banned some time ago."

Other British institutions could also follow the ban.

The British Museum has confirmed it is reviewing its policy on selfie sticks. A spokeswoman said: "The safety of objects and visitors is paramount to the British Museum". [...]

The Tate does still allow the use of selfie sticks "provided that users respect fellow visitors and adhere to Tate's photography policy".

A spokesman for the Natural History Museum said it does not currently ban the use of selfie sticks and "do not currently see a need to alter our stance on this issue".

The National Museum Cardiff does not permit any camera extension devices such as tripods, and it classes selfie sticks under this category. A spokesperson said the policy was in place "to ensure the safety of our visitors and the museum's collections, especially during crowded conditions". "We encourage museum visitors to take selfies and share their experiences but leave the selfie sticks at home." [...]
