While on lockdown, a former professor of yours, Ms. Santos, has sent you some information about an online course:

After the successful course "Psychology and the Good Life", which you followed in spring 2019, Yale University is offering a free online course, The Science of Well-Being, that teaches you how to be happier. I have decided to share the course contents with a wider audience and you can audit the course entirely for free or opt for a $49 certificate of completion.

The course covers the following topics in weekly installments:

- Misconceptions about happiness
- Why our expectations are so bad
- How we can overcome our biases
- Putting strategies into practice

They include video lectures, optional readings and "rewirement" activities to do each day in order to build happier habits.

Write an email to Ms. Santos asking for further information, such as whether the course can be accessed on any date, what type of commitment is expected on your part, etc.

Social media influencers have risen meteorically in the last few years and enjoy now not only high incomes, but also big power when it comes to dictating what is in or what is out or what the general public's opinion on a number of issues should be.

Write an article arguing why this could be so and analysing their dubious legitimacy and the potential dangers entailed.

OPTION B

The COVID-19 crisis has revealed that the industrial infrastructure in our country is quite weak and that we rely heavily on exports. This situation has also laid bare our unstable job market, mainly relying on tourism and on the construction industry, which are easily affected after an economic crisis.

Write a report suggesting alternative ways to reconstruct the job market in Spain, considering which sectors need to be reinforced and which kind of measures could help in order to do so.
